

DO YOU WANT A MASSIVE MAST NEAR TO YOUR HOME?

The government wants to remove your right to object.
But you can stop them.

Last year, over 400 local objections stopped an unwanted 20m (69ft) mast in Fulham. H&F Council had to listen.

The government wants to make it easier for developers to have their masts, regardless of your views or the possible consequences, such as to health or the value of your home.

In a worst case, developers would be allowed to impose masts even where they have been heavily rejected.

Planning permission will automatically be given in 'green' areas. In others, planning inspectors will decide what representation you can make (if any). But you might have to be a mind reader if you don't know an application exists. The existing prominent site notice and resident letter approach will be axed and you will have to ferret for online information.

These changes will also enable much wider unwanted developments.

HAVE YOUR SAY...

- Greg Hands MP has stated that he is "always happy to listen to the concerns" of constituents, but as a MP, does not have "any direct control over planning" (22 July 2021). Unfortunately, as a minister, he would be bound to support any government attempts to dictate changes to planning rules that would take away our rights.

Voter power got the damaging Charing Cross Hospital proposals stopped, and can also stop these insane proposals, which are part of a wider attack on our freedoms.

- In a debate on 21 June, MPs backed the right of communities to object. But the government isn't listening properly. For more information on the issues: www.saynoto5g.uk/planning.htm.
